

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

“Some Keep the Sabbath Going to Church” by Emily Dickinson is a poem the author wrote to help describe how she views religion. Some people go to church on the sabbath (some sort of rest day, week, etc) but the author stays at home. The Bobolink is a bird, it is the author’s choir and the orchard acts as the Dome (house of God).

Some people wear specific clothes, and follow strict tradition to worship at church but the author goes as herself; to her own “church”.

The author does not feel like she will eventually get to heaven by following the rules of church but instead is constantly getting there by living her life. The author’s favorite church is the orchard, or more general nature.

After see several means of “I Never Saw a Moor”, we can say that the poetry is talking about faith or strong believe in a religion’s rule even God. Although, never have seen.

“I Died for Beauty but was Scarce” tells us that Emily Dickinson never waste her time to manage such a goal but failed in the end.
